The Rejection of Consequentialism

Samuel Scheffler 1994-08-11 In contemporary philosophy, substantive moral theories are classified as either classical (or direct) consequentialism, which holds that what is morally right or wrong is determined, at least in part, by the consequences of actions; or as deontological theories, which hold that moral principles are absolute, independent of consequences. The Rejection of Consequentialism is a critical response to consequentialism, arguing that consequentialism is untenable because it cannot adequately account for the moral significance of certain actions.

The Motor of the Century

Shyon Baumann 2018-06-05 Today's moviegoers and critics generally consider some Hollywood products—even some blockbusters—their legitimate works of art. But through the first half century of motion pictures very few Americans would have thought to call an American movie "art." Up through the 1950s, American movies were regarded as a form of popular, even lower-class, entertainment. By the 1960s and 1970s, however, viewers were rarely anything but highly sophisticated. When they went to the movies, they expected an experience that would challenge their intellect, expand their horizons, and stimulate their emotions. The stories they wanted to hear told how social and cultural forces radically changed the public's perceptions of American movies just as those forces were radically changing the movies themselves. The development in the United States of an appreciation of film as an art was, Baumann shows, the product of large changes in Hollywood and America society as a whole. With the posteraz rise of television, American movie audiences shrank dramatically and Hollywood responded by appealing to richer and more educated viewers. Around the same time, European intellectuals began to study and write about cinema as an art form, and not just European ones—deserved to be considered art.
