In Immigration Research Papers, the authors explore how immigration policies are fundamentally reshaping Latino families. During their interviews with undocumented young adults, Frank D. Bean, Susan K. Brown, and James D. Bachmeier document the extent to which the outsider status remains a reality for many unauthorized parents. In Parents Without Papers, Bean, Brown, and Bachmeier detail the ways in which unauthorized parents experience the U.S. immigration system and the resulting challenges faced by their children. The authors also discuss the ways in which unauthorized parents attempt to gain legal status, the disadvantages of the second generation, and the implications for public policy. Through a series of case studies, they highlight the diverse experiences of unauthorized parents and their children, emphasizing the importance of understanding the complex and multifaceted nature of unauthorized immigration in the United States. The authors argue that a more nuanced and inclusive approach to immigration policy is necessary to address the needs of unauthorized parents and their children, and to promote greater social and economic integration for all Americans.
