How Will You Measure Your Life? (Harvard Business Review Classics) (Cassance C. imprints 2017) In the spring of 2002, Harvard Business School’s graduating class asked Harvard Business School professor Clayton Christensen an unexpected question: ‘What will you measure your life by?’ It was the last question in their course, a final exam in leadership, and was inspired by a reading assignment from their mentor, physicist Richard Feynman. Christensen’s answer is based on the ideas of Feynman and on the lives of great people from history who measured their lives by their achievements, not by their status. It is a stirring call to think deeply about what we want to achieve in life. It has become a favorite self-help idea for those who want to live more meaningful lives.
