The first ten lies they tell you in high school. "Speak up for yourself--we want to know what you have to say!" From the first moment of her freshman year at Herrymether High, Melinda knows this is a big fat lie, part of the nonsense of high school. She is friendly, outcast, because she hosted an end-of-summer party by herself. At the party, an older man comes to the door,酒 drunk, and attacks her. To save herself, Melinda speaks up, and he is imprisoned. Even though she is not there, the attack has the power of a living presence, isolated and practically stops talking altogether. Only her art class offers some solace, and it is through her work on an art project that she finally is able to face what really happened that terrible high school party; she was raped by an upperclassman, and he is out on parole when she has another violent encounter with him. But this time Melinda fights back, refuses to be silent, and thereby finds her voice. She uses the media to her advantage, and in a bitterly ironic voice delivers a blow to the hypocritical world of high school. She speaks for many a disenfranchised and abused young woman.

Writing Anthology Carole McGranahan 2020-04-24 In Writing Anthropology, fifty-two anthropologists reflect on the challenges of writing for an anthropological audience. They address the range of styles, formats, and purposes for which they write. From ethnographic essays to disciplinary essays, from research articles to teaching notes, these authors share their tips and techniques for writing in a way that is accessible to diverse audiences, and that will engage and hold the interest of readers. The authors' contributions help us reframe our approach to scholarly writing as both craft and commitment. These short essays cover a wide range of territory, from ethnography, historical analysis, and interviews to content design, evaluations, and call-to-action statements. Many students and engineers consider themselves poor writers or find the writing process difficult. The good news is that you do not have to be a talented writer to produce a good argumentative essay. The bad news is that you have to be a careful writer. The most important rule is: "Write, rewrite, write, rewrite, rewrite, rewrite."
